Harvard Business Review is the leading destination for smart management thinking. Several different points of view about leadership. It's a great opportunity to understand that everybody can become a leader with the correct attitude. I strongly recommend this book to leaders who are trying to improve their skills.

Interesting articles. Needed for class. Short, insightful, and to the point.

Great read. It's a must for a leader or those aspiring to lead others.

I'm reading these texts for a leadership course and they are very interesting articles. They can be very useful for learning leadership techniques that people can use in their everyday lives but are biased towards business and organizational leadership instead of social or Civic leadership. They are still a good read to get the basic concepts of leadership such as: leadership vs management. Worth the read.

Anecdotal and instructive readings from top business instructors, researchers and writers. The reader is guided by helpful guidelines for growing as a leader. Though the focus was on business leadership, the principles would be translatable for the most part into other vocations. The articles tended to be a bit redundant, though.

This is a worthwhile read for anyone looking to gain more insight into the world of corporate leadership. It will help you align your thinking with that of great leaders. However, it is too enterprise focused. It's best used in a book club where conversation can help translate its wisdom into actions.

MUST read for anyone who desires self-understanding and self-improvement. Not just for leaders (not such a great title as people may think it won't apply to everyone). If you have heard of the "fundamental attribution error" that all humans make, then this easy but brilliant read will shed the light on just how we justify it and how to get OUT of the box!!!

I ordered this book for a class that I'm taking and it is a very easy read. It's broken up into different articles by various authors which provides a lot of variety and insight. There are many inspirational stories and advice that can be helpful in building leadership skills. I would recommend this if you are interested in leadership or need it for some type of school project.
